Jamie W. Hall is a concert baritone and ensemble singer with a passion for oratorio and art song. Growing up in a Yorkshire mining village in the 1980s, Jamie's route into classical music was somewhat unconventional. With only a few piano lessons and an adolescence spent busking show tunes behind him, he nevertheless followed his heart and found himself studying music at university where he discovered both his voice and a love of classical choral music. Even before graduating in 2005, Jamie had established himself as a skilful ensemble singer and concert soloist, and it was in 2009 that he was appointed a full-time member of the BBC Singers, a role which he has combined successfully with a busy solo singing schedule for over a decade.

Jamie's various choral works have been performed as far afield as Australia, broadcast on BBC radio and recorded for commercial release. He has received a number of commissions writing for professional choirs, children's choirs and amateur parish choirs, producing works that play to the strengths of these very different groups. Indeed he enjoys working within such boundaries and successfully writes music which combines performability with originality.
